

Title: A taste worth coming back for.

0:00 - 0:05 | Exposition:

Dim light. The head of an adjustable hospital bed is raised. The old man is hooked up to a cardiac monitor. On the screen — a fading pulse line. A rare, slowing, dying rhythm beeps: Beep... (long pause) ...beep... In the hallway behind a half-open door, adults stand in the shadows. They fuss, cry, whisper — they've already given up and are simply waiting for the inevitable end.

0:05 - 0:15 | Introduction of the Heroine:

The camera drops to the eye level of a 5-year-old girl — the great-granddaughter. She wanders through the chaos of adults holding an open can of Drink X. She has no concept of death or tragedy; all these tears belong to a world she doesn't understand. Copying her playtime routines with dolls — where she "feeds" and "treats" them — she drifts into the room, walks up to her great-grandfather, and looks at him as if he's simply a "sleeping" friend.

0:15 - 0:20 | Action:

The girl steps right up to the bedside. On the monitor, the pulse line is almost flat. A final continuous tone begins: Beeeeeeep... With pure childlike innocence and her instinctive "play-doctor" care, she decides to "train" Grandpa with what she herself loves. She gently tilts the can and lets a single drop of Drink X fall onto his dry lips.

0:20 - 0:25 | Climax:

A moment of absolute silence. The camera focuses on the life-support monitor. Suddenly a sharp, powerful spike! The rhythm bursts back to life: Beep! Beep-beep! Beep!

0:25 - 0:28 | Silent Dialogue:

The pulse line fully stabilizes. The old man slowly opens his eyes, turns his head slightly toward the girl, and gives her a small but deeply warm smile. His hand weakly — yet confidently — squeezes her tiny fingers.

0:28 - 0:30 | Finale:

The girl, still unaware of the miracle she has just performed (to her it was simply play), calmly turns around and walks out of the room, taking another sip from her can. In the hallway, the adults continue crying, completely unaware that life has just returned to the room behind them.
